TYPICAL OLD VILLAGE CHURCH

Writer's Description of House of Worship is One That Will Linger in the Memory.

The Methodist church in Berlin is a little gray house, with a long-narrow bellry. The eaves come very low. The doors on weekdays are like sorrowful eyes closed in prayer for the members who may be doing what they ought not to do. On Sundays they are wide open, like the heart of a good man. The bell in the bellry is not so loud; one of those singular Sabbath bells heard only in village churches. In summer weather the shutters of many leaves fall upon the roof from two great oaks, like glimmering wreaths of shade and sun. In winter winds their naked boughs look more alive to us if they beat it, like the love of God, in a firm embrace.

The inside is filled with a brown glow from the unpainted walls and pews, which have darkened to a deeper, richer tone, very soft and kind.

On the first Sabbath in every month the communion table stands within the altar, a white cloth spread over the bread and wine, and the two gables. We still take the sacrament here from a common chalice, decently crusting the Lord to save us from each other's contagion.

If there is anything else in this world so much like the memory of "his loving kindness, oh how great," as an old church like this, with the people kneeling, silent and sterner, side by side, about this altar on such a day, neither doubting nor judging one another for the moment, I have never seen it.—From "A Circuit Rider's Widow," by Clara Harris in the Saturday Evening Post.

Concerning Distant Religions.

The founder of Buddhism was professedly a reformer of Brahminism (or Hinduism), which even in the sixth century before Christ was sufficiently ancient that the early doctrines were shrouded in a mass of superstition, and it was this that Buddha tried to reform. Buddhism, Confucianism, and Taoism are practically of the same age: in fact, Confucius and Lao-Tse (the founder of Taoism) were personally acquainted with each other, and, according to the best authorities, they were contemporaries of Buddha, Sakya-Muni. Brahminism is a much older religion, and any reader of our Bible is aware that Judaism also had its beginnings very much earlier than the sixth century B. C. The Exodus was probably a thousand years before then, and, of course, Abraham was still earlier.

I should say that the correct answer to the question was Brahminism, Judaism, and Zoroastrianism, and probably in that order.—Exchange.

In New Countries.

All new countries have taken the most obvious and easy course. They have given away for nothing, or for a song, the whole of their natural resources to anybody who will undertake to exploit them.

And those who have received them have judged them to be theirs by a kind of natural right.

"These farms, mines, forests—of course they are ours. Did not we discover them? Did not we squat upon them? Have we not 'tized our labor' with them?"

If pressed as to the claims of later comers they would probably reply that there remains "as much and as good" for others.
